Experimental 9-year-olds and adults were tested along with younger 7-year-olds to evaluate the exhaustivity of sentences. The results showed that while preschoolers and adults differed significantly, there was no difference among the children. Overall, the study concluded that preschoolers did not interpret exhaustivity in a pragmatic manner, but adults did.